We selected the best Vanguard mutual funds for our list to address the needs of long-term investors contributing to tax-advantaged retirement plans and actively managed funds, including both single-asset and balanced funds. We narrowed the selection by eliminating long-term bond and sector-specific funds and only retained funds that offered Vanguard's $3,000 minimum investment threshold. Finally, we considered the investors with a Vanguard managed 401(k) or 403(b) and offered selections appropriate to that cohort. Our final list included funds that concentrated on U.S. and international equities, bonds, balanced allocations and active management. Due to their popularity among investors, a dividend achievers fund and a sustainable investing index fund were included. Our best Vanguard mutual funds list includes both actively managed funds and passive index funds. So what's the difference between active vs. passive funds? Passive index, such as the S&P 500 or the Russell 3000. Costs to operate the fund are lower, as management only needs to track the composition of the index, rather than research and pick investments. They tend to offer greater diversification and steadier returns. Managers run active funds by analyzing and picking assets in a never-ending attempt to outperform benchmark indexes or average market returns. Actively managed funds that the following assets in a never-ending attempt to outperform benchmark indexes or average market returns. Vanguard index funds are a type of mutual fund where thousands of investors pool their cash to purchase shares in a fund that mimics a benchmark index, such as the S&P 500 (hence the name "index funds"). That was a radically different investment approach when Vanguard founder John Bogle launched the first publicly available index fund in 1976. At the time, active investing — where fund managers try to beat the market's returns — held sway. The index fund sought simply to match the rise and fall of broad market, industry or sector moves, and allowed everyday Americans more access to investing in stocks. This simpler approach — known as passive investors now flock to passive funds. And many of those investors to keep more of their money in the market. As a result, investors now flock to passive funds. And many of those investors turn to Vanguard, the world's No. 1 originator of mutual funds, with $8.1 trillion assets under management as of 2022.
